

Published on American Geosciences Institute (<https://www.americangeosciences.org>)

Home > EARTH: Still in a Haze: Black Carbon

EARTH: Still in a Haze: Black Carbon

Black carbon - fine particles of soot in the atmosphere produced from the burning of fossil fuels or biomass - a major contributor to the thick hazes of pollution hovering over cities around the world, has been known to be a health hazard for decades. But over the last decade, scientists have been examining in increasing detail the various ways in which these particles contribute to another hazard: heating up the planet.

Press Release PDF:

EARTH2April11.pdf
