

Published on American Geosciences Institute (<https://www.americangeosciences.org>)

Home > EARTH: South Africa's Toxic Legacy: Acid mine drainage threatens water supplies

EARTH: South Africa's Toxic Legacy: Acid mine drainage threatens water supplies

In the Witwatersrand goldfields, not far from bustling Johannesburg, South Africa, more than a century of mining has left the region littered with mounds of waste and underlain by a deep underground network of abandoned mine shafts, which are gradually filling with water. Today, the mines are producing less and less gold and more and more sulfuric acid.

Press Release PDF:

20110926a-EARTH-AcidMine.pdf
